gE.CO template

The gE.CO Template (D3.1) is first and foremost a necessary tool to collect all the technical and analytical information about all potential case-studies of our research project. The research project seeks to deeply analyse about 50 key case studies, representative and illustrative both of civic practices and governmental policies regarding urban-common initiatives. To do so, we need to firstly identify around 180 potential cases across all of European countries which should also cover all thematic areas in which such practices and policies are taking place (i.e. culture and leisure, sport, employment and entrepreneurship, urban patrimony, environment and ecology, civic engagement, etc.).

This template, therefore, should contain the minimum-technical information of all of these case studies in order to firstly organize and secondly select the most representative ones of each country and each thematic area. With this purpose, it should capture information about the location, thematic area, number of people involved, legal status, etc. Thus, both the content information and its organization must be synthetic, standardized, and well-organized.

All this information of each case study will be uploaded to a virtual map on the project’s webpage through which all of this information will be open and available to the public. Its goal is to show to the public a mapping-organized collection of the most representative civic practices and governmental initiatives regarding urban-commons.

In order to mapping most of “Generative European Commons” projects, we have designed two different templates as shown below. The first should be used to collect information about civic-common initiatives, while the second one should be used just for public policies or projects. The former has been also divided into two sub-template models to properly organize and collect information regarding urban spaces-managed initiatives on the one hand, and for projects or services not necessarily involving the use of a particular space, on the other hand.
